We surmise the ostracum may be made of horizontal prisms, or lamellae, each of which may be compounded of lamels that stand more nearly vertical. Evidence as to whether these inferred lamels are in alternating series, as in the hypostracum, is lacking. Returning to the internal records of repair left within the shell structure, these may be patent as in figure 7 or less evident, but always there is a small region in which the normal structure is upset for a space before being exactly continued in the new lip. That there has been a break and repair is thus shown not only externally by some scar and by temporary disturbance of the normal color pattern, but also by microscopic traces within. The disturbance is local and near the outer surface where the new lip joins the old, but later as both grew thicker, the structure is uniform in each, as in the bottom of figure 7, and finally the internal face of the shell shows no sign of where the break was. As already noted, the new cuticle runs off at abnormal angle and is supported by ostracum in curved position, but soon both grow back to proper direction, making a curve that shows permanently inside the shell (figure 7). In this specimen the hypostracum in the new shell has almost all its plates vertical and parallel to those in the old shell, but there is for a while an aberration near the junction....
