Not illustrated. 1909 Excerpt: .of thought and action, such as will not only influence involuntary functional activity, but also secure such a conformity to the physiological requirements of health as will best allow the wonderful recuperative power of the cells of the organism to re-establish and maintain a condition of health. The physical effect of psychologic influences has not received the consideration that this important psychological fact deserves on the part of the general practitioner. We have not truly estimated the importance of such therapeutic resources as will best maintain a heightened degree of resistive power in the cells of the physical organism so that the more serious structural changes would not result. When a more perfect state of health is maintained by the general practitioner, the surgeon will have fewer pathologic lesions to fall to him for relief. Maintain a heightened degree of resistive power in the cells of the human organism and there will be fewer gynecologic cases, less tuberculosis, fewer eye, ear, nose and throat diseases, and even the cases that fall to the lot of the general practitioner, such as the infectious, contagious and febrile diseases, will be of milder character and fewer in number. But the office work of the general practitioner will be more remunerative and the dignity of his role among medical men will be more justly esteemed. At this stage of the development of psychotherapy, considered as an adjunct to the general practice of medicine, many physicians lack that...
